

Nutritional Therapy

Nutritional Therapy is a system of healing based on the belief that food, as nature intended, provides the medicine we need to obtain and maintain a state of health. Food is the medicine and medicine is the food.

Although some health problems require specific medication, many conditions can be relieved effectively with Nutritional Therapy. By developing a sense of control over our companions' health, we make them less dependent on allopathic treatments.

Even without a specific illness, Nutritional Therapy benefits our companions by keeping them in a state of optimum health. It is safe for puppies, kittens as well as adult companions, and the change of eating patterns that is typically prescribed usually has far fewer side effects than synthetic medicines.

The benefits of Nutritional Therapy are sometimes immediate, and its effects can bring about long-lasting changes in our companions' lives. As there is usually not a single "best" diet for any animal companion, we tend to fall prey to common hear-say, nutritional fallacies and erroneous information transcribed from human diet philosophy. While the best gauge for a suitable diet is conveniently based on the appearance of our companions or if any allergie(s) is/are exhibited, that often deludes us from the fact that they may be lacking vital nutrients for a considerable time, leading to nutritional deficiencies.

Contextually, nutritional deficiencies are thought to be uncommon in dogs and cats, but it may well be developed secondary to other diseases or its treatment.

Thus Nutritional Therapy presents the following options for owners :

- seek general advice on how nutrition may assist their companions to progress towards the path of wellness and;
- learn how appropriate nutrition can affect and change their companions' quality of life though there's an absence of major illnesses.

Nutritional Therapy is recommended to be administered in conjunction with conventional veterinary consultation or with other complementary holistic modalities. Kindly enquire with our Customer Care Specialist regarding this service.

Any fur parent with a genuine concern for their companion may seek consultation.

Petopia[®]

Centre for Holistic Pet Wellness